of treatment. At times the attack is nerious, being distressing to the individual and annoying to his associates, and should be promptly treated.

One source of relief is a swallow of cold water. A fit of hiscough can be cured by sprinkling water on the face; dashing a handful in the face is not a pleasant aurorise from a devoted friend pleasant surprise from a devoted friend or mother, but it is a sure cure, due, perhaps, as much to the sudden revul-sion of feeling as to the water. If a buby has a blecough it is an indication that he has had far too much dinner; a change of position will bring relief, a favorite one being to put the well-fed youngster on his stomach across the

An attack of biccoughs in children is frequently followed by a bad night, either sleeplessness or the nightmare. Of course, the mistake was in the surfelt; the mother or the nurse must bear the blame and find a way to stimulate digestion. He and His Warriors Were Scared Out of a Theater. Fifteen years ago times were lively in Dakota, and Fargo was a booming town of twelve thousand people. Half a dozen theatrical enterprises were in full blast, and a seventh manager opened a new house, the magnificence of which far outshone that of its comctitors. The theater was to be opened Monday evening, and that morning the train from the west brought the great Sioux chief, Sitting Bull, with a small party of Indians, who were en route to Washington to see the Great Father. The new management secured the attendance of the warriors for the opening of his house, and the hundreds of "tenderfeet" who had never yet of "tenderfeet" who had never yet seen a real Indian in war paint paid

The stage manager announced that she would bang suspended from the trapeze bar by her knees and support a heavy cannon with her teeth while it was discharged. At sight of the cannon Sitting Bull and his men began to show signs of unensiness. They shifted about in their seats nervously. Two men lifted the canon and left it dangling from the woman's jaws. The muzzle of the weapon swung on a level with the Indian's headdress. Sitting Bull and his warriors by this time had become extremely nervous. They looked at each other inquiringly, as if they suspected that they had been drawn into a trap and were to be de-liberately slaughtered. They jubbered at each other excitedly and so far forgot their stoicism as to look over their shoulders. Finally everything was in readiness; the stage manager stepped back, gave the string he held a jerk, there was a flash and a roar, and out of the cloud of smoke that shot into the parquet Sitting Bull and his warriors sprang, wildly shouting as they made their way down the sisle, striking madly right and left with the longstemmed stone pipes which they carried. No attempt was made by the audience to stop the Indians, who made their way outside, and didn't stop running until they reached the hotel.
